Topic: Autonomous Mobile Robotics in the Warehouse

Speaker: Brian Harris

Autonomous Mobile Robotics in the Warehouse

In a modern supply chain world of escalating customer expectations, ongoing labor shortages, and increasing demands to lower operational costs while maximizing throughput, Autonomous Mobile Robotics (AMR) is the fastest growing technology in warehousing operations and highlights the accelerating adoption of advanced technologies by organizations looking to increase efficiency, reduce cost, improve warehouse user experience, and future-proof supply chain strategies.

The Association for Supply Chain Management (ASCM) is the global leader in supply chain organizational transformation, innovation and leadership.

This is no more evident than the 2025 Gartner Warehouse Management System Critical Capabilities Report that projects by 2028, "80% of warehouses and distribution centers will implement some form of robotics or warehouse automation.

The robotics revolution is here. Will you be ready?

Utilizing industry insights and personal experiences collaborating on Small Business to Enterprise-level robotics projects, I will dive into a holistic overview of the Autonomous Mobile Robotics landscape, explore key considerations when evaluating robotics strategies, and provide lessons learned from both successful and unsuccessful real world project examples.

Brian Harris is currently an Account Executive with Made4Net and former Enterprise Account Manager with Infios (Korber/Highjump) focused on Supply Chain Execution technologies including Warehouse Management (WMS), Robotics, Labor Management (LMS), and Transportation Management (TMS) within the Retail, eCommerce, Manufacturing, Food & Beverage, 3PL, and Consumer Goods industries.
